President Kovind’s Address to the Nation on the 70th Anniversary of India’s Independence

We are celebrating the 70th anniversary of India’s Independence today. This day marks the end of a long and arduous struggle for freedom. It is a day of joy, a day of celebration, a day of reflection, and a day of commitment.

I am here to address you all on this historic occasion. It is a day when we recall the sacrifices of our forefathers and the hard work of our leaders. It is a day when we remember the struggle for independence and the dreams of our ancestors.

India is a country of diversity, where people from different cultures, religions, and languages live together in harmony. We are a nation of 1.3 billion people, who speak 23 languages and have a variety of traditions and customs.

We have made significant progress in the last 70 years. We have built a strong economy, improved infrastructure, and expanded access to education and healthcare. We have made strides in science and technology, and have become a global player in the world economy.

But we cannot rest on our laurels. We must continue to work towards a better future for all our citizens. We must ensure that everyone has access to education, healthcare, and basic amenities. We must promote tolerance and respect for all religions, cultures, and traditions.

We must also work towards a more inclusive society, where everyone has equal rights and opportunities. We must promote gender equality and fight against all forms of discrimination.

We must also continue to be a peaceful and responsible member of the world community. We must promote dialogue and understanding among nations. We must work towards a world free from poverty, hunger, and conflict.

In conclusion, let us remember the lessons of history. Let us work together to build a better future for all our citizens. Let us celebrate 70 years of Independence and chart a course for a vibrant, prosperous, and peaceful India.

Thank you.
